

Families with Multiple Problems on the Edge of Care

Families Delivery Team
Families at Risk Division
Department for Education

What is Edge of Care?

Children and young people at the 'edge of care' are those:

- who are able to remain safely within their family (as a viable alternative to care) and receive intensive family support to address their difficulties / problems;
- where reunification with the family (immediate or otherwise) is possible;
- where a move to independent living is a viable option.

Not intervening early is expensive....

What do good systems and/or practice look like?

Services that families most value and use:

- are easily accessible, culturally sensitive, have practitioners who are approachable and responsive;
- pay attention to family and individual strengths as well as needs;
- work with other agencies and maintain a focus on the family as a whole increasing the network of support for families;
- have a professional and managerial culture which values the development of good working relationships and recognises this is needed for good inter-disciplinary and inter-agency work with families.

Eileen Munro Review of Child Protection

- First part of Munro Review report published on 1 October
- Argues that previous reforms have not delivered positive, long lasting improvements in the front line because:
 - professionals too focused on complying with rules and regulations so spending less time assessing children's needs.
 - a target driven culture means social workers are unable to exercise their professional judgement.
 - too much emphasis on getting the process right, rather than on improving outcomes for children
- Munro interim report published Jan 2011
- Final Report/Recommendations expected April 2011
